Årstider under forandring?

Vi er netop startet på den nye år. Begyndelsen af januar. Uden for hersker den kolde vind, sneen flyger omkring hushjørnerne. Der ligger storeedriver af sne i haven. Alt er hvidt og koldt.

Nej, sådan er det ikke! Vi har den 12. januar i året 2020. Der er relativt mørkt uden for. Ingen sne. Græsplænen er grøn. Det småregner. Mit store magnoliatræ har allerede fået store bladknopper. Så tidligt på året, og træet mener, at det er tid til at springe ud i et nyt dejligt forår.

Kigger vi nærmere rundt i haven, så vrirler forårstegnene frem. Solsorten løber rundt og skubber til det døde løv i havebedet. Nedenunder finder den saftige, levende orm og små insekter. Vinterfuglene, der er kommet ned fra Skandinavien og Sibirien æder sig fede på fuglebrættet, selv om de nu nok let kunne finde deres mad i naturen omkring huset. Højt på himlen kan jeg se og høre sangsvaner og gæs, der fra kysten er på vej ind for at fouragere på landmandens grønne marker.

I Arktis blev jeg vant til, at de fire klassiske årstider ikke fremstod, som de plejer at gøre her i Europa. Vinteren gik direkte over i sommer, og sommerens landskaber blev hurtigt omdannet til vinterens snehvide fjeldmarker. Måske skal vi også her i Nordeuropa vænne os til, at årstiderne, som vi kender dem fra barndommen og fra vores kulturarv i sange og litteratur, nu erstattes af en årets gang i naturen, som vi aldrig har haft fantasi til at forestille os?

I denne ugens foto er der medtaget et billede fra Lille Vildmose for månederne året rundt i år 2019.

Seasons during transformation?

We have just started the new year. Early January. Outside the cold wind reigns, the snow is drifting around the corner of the house. There is a large snow drift in the garden. Everything is white and cold.

No, not at all. This is the 12th. January of the year 2020. It is relatively dark outside. No snow. The lawn is green. It is drizzling. My large magnolia tree has already developed big leaf buds. As early in the year, and the tree thinks it is time to burst into leaf in a new nice spring.

If we take a closer look around in the garden, the signs of spring are alive. The blackbird runs around and pushes to the dead leaf in the flowerbed. Underneath the bird finds the succulent, alive worm and small insects. The winter birds, which have arrived from Scandinavia and Siberia stuff themselves with food on the bird table, although they easily now can find their food in the nature around the house. Loud in the sky, I can watch and hear the whooper swans and the geese, which from the coast are heading into forage on the farmer's green fields.

In the Arctic, I became accustomed to the four classical seasons not being the same as they usually are in Europe. Winter passed directly into summer, and the landscape of the summer were quickly transformed into the snow-white mountain fields of winter. Perhaps, in Northern Europe, the seasons, as we know them from childhood and from our cultural heritage in songs and literature, are now being replaced by a course of the year in nature, that we have never had imagined?

In this photo of the week, a photo for the months of the year 2019 from the bog, Lille Vildmose, has been included.
