Skoven i november

November måned har korte dage. Det er med at komme af sted, Inden tusmørket sætter ind. Alt er vådt, og på himlen truer regntunge skyer.

Først virker det koldt. Den fugtige, kolde vind trænger ind gennem selv den tykkeste uld. Men den raske travetur giver hurtigt varmen, og vi ænsrer ikke længere kulden.

Det nedfaldne løv dæmper alle lyde. Det gør det let at komme tæt på skovens dyr. Det er også lige som om, at fuglene og de andre dyr ikke har vænnet sig til, at de ikke længere er skjult bag træets blade.

Gule, brune og orange farver. Efterårets farver. Men midt i det hele også den smukkeste, livsbekræftende grønne farve.

Jeg går og tænker over meteorologens budskab: Endnu en grå efterårsdag med masser af regn. Forleden meddelte det meteorologiske institut også, at der var kedeligt vejr undervejs. Har de mennesker aldrig været i skoven i november?

The forest in November

The month of November has short days. It is time to get going, before twilight sets in. Everything is wet, and in the sky, rain-heavy clouds threaten.

At first, it seems cold. The damp, cold wind penetrates through even the thickest wool. But the briskly walk get us warm, and we no longer feel the cold.

The fallen leaves deaden all sounds. This makes it easy to get close to the animals in the forest. It seems like the birds and the other animals have not become accustomed to the fact, that they are no longer hidden behind the leaves of the tree.

Yellow, brown and orange colours. Autumn colours. But among these colours also the most beautiful, life-affirming green colour.

As I walk, I think about the message of the meteorologist: Another grey autumn day with heavy rain. Few days ago, the meteorological institute also announced, that there was dull weather in the forecast. Have these people never been walking in a forest in November?
