Strømmende vand

Åen har sit udspring i den store skov. Kilderne med grundvand fosser ud af de høje bakker. Åen bliver bredere og bredere. Den snor sig gennem grønne enge, uvejsomt krat, ud over åbne sletter med marker og ender til sidst ude i fjorden længere mod nord.

Vand, der strømmer gennem et landskab, har altid fascineret mig. Der er noget livgivende og rensende i at se vandet strømme roligt forbi. Ordet harmoni falder mig også ind.

Havde åen øjne ville den på sig vej se smukke træer, forunderlige træer, menneskets huse på dalskråningen og kvæg, der står og gumler.

Mange dyr og den frodige, grønne vegetation fortæller, at der er mange, der føler sig veltilpas i ådalen.

Fotografierne er fra en ekskursion til Lindenberg Å i juli 2008.

Flowing water

The small river has its source in the large forest. The springs of groundwater gush out of the high hills. The stream is growing wider. It meanders through green meadows, rough scrub, over open plains with fields and finally ends up in the fjord further north.

Water flowing through a landscape has always fascinated me. There is something life-giving and purifying in watching the water flow calmly by. The word harmony also comes to mind.

If the river had eyes, it would see beautiful trees, marvellous trees, the houses of man on the valley slope and cattle munching.

Many animals and the lush, green vegetation tell that there are many who feel comfortable in the river valley.

The photographs are from a field trip to the small river, Lindenberg Å, in July 2008.
