Livet i skovbrynet

V i har været igennem nogle kolde, regn- og stormfulde novemberdage. Overalt ser jeg tegn på efterårets forfald: Visne og rådne blade.

Men overalt finder jeg også tegn på nyt liv: Frø og friske knopper, der er klar til forårets komme. Nogle planter har bevaret friskheden og den grønne farve. Flere planter er endog fortsat i blomst.

Liv og død, farver og former, dufte, fuglestemmer, fasanen eller musene, der rasler nede i tykke lag af løv.

Kunne man forestille sig en mere intensiv oplevelse? Ikke en oplevelse, der skal findes på en ekspedition til en af klodens fjerne egne, men tæt på skovbrynet i min egen have.

Life at the edge of the wood

We have been through some cold, rainy, and stormy November days. Everywhere I see signs of autumn decay: dead and rotten leaves.

But everywhere I also find signs of new life: the seeds and the fresh buds ready for the coming of spring. Some plants have retained the freshness and the green colour. Several plants have even continued to bloom.

Life and death, colours and shapes, scents, bird voices, the pheasant, or the mouse, rustling down in the thick layers of leaves.

Could a more intensive experience be imagined? Not an experience to be found on an expedition to one of the planet's distant regions, but close to the edge of the forest in my garden.
