En regnfuld dag

Lytter til meteorologen på TV. Han fortæller om en regnfuld dag. Kedeligt gråt vejr for næsten hele landet med regn og uden sol. Jeg tænker: Perfekt vejr, lige hvad jeg ønsker mig. Jeg er sjældent enig i meteorologens værdisætning af dagens vejr. Jeg forstår ikke, hvorfor højt uddannede mennesker ikke kan indse, at deres værdi for såkaldt godt eller dårligt vejr, divergerer meget fra menneske til menneske.

Det bliver til en køretur ud i nowhere. GPS'en viser små skovveje eller markveje, og vi følger pr. intuition veje, som vi slet ikke kender og aldrig har kørt ad.

Regnen har været voldsom i timevis, og nogle steder er de små hulveje mudrede eller oversvømmede. Det grønne løv skinner med deres fugtige overflade i de smukkeste grønne nuancer.

På markerne og ude i mosen går livet sin daglige gang. Dyrelivet forsøger at trodse regnen. Rådyrene står våde og fouragerer ude i kornmarkerne. Den våde tårnfalk sidder på sin post på hegnspælen på jagt efter livstegn fra mosegrise og mus nede i engens græs. Mosehornuglen kommer flyvende. Den sætter sig på en hegnspæl, og ryster sin flotte fjerpragt.

A rainy day

Listening to the meteorologist on TV. He talks about a rainy day. Dull grey weather for almost the entire country with rain and no sun. I think: Perfect weather, just what I wish for. I rarely agree with the meteorologist's value judgment of the day's weather. I do not understand why highly educated people cannot realize that their idea of so-called good or bad weather varies greatly from person to person.

It turns into a drive out into nowhere. The GPS shows small forest roads or country lanes, and we follow roads by intuition—roads we do not know at all and have never driven on before.

The rain has been heavy for hours, and in some places the small sunken roads are muddy or flooded. The green foliage shines with its damp surface in the most beautiful shades of green.

Out in the fields and in the bog, life goes on as usual. Wildlife tries to defy the rain. The roe deer stand wet, foraging in the grain fields. The wet kestrel sits at its post on a fence post, hunting for signs of life from water voles and mice down in the meadow grass. The short-eared owl comes flying. It lands on a fence post and shakes its magnificent plumage.
