Kystland i november

Jeg står ved kysten til det store hav. Tågen ligger tungt og tæt omkring mig. Lyden af bølgerne, der ruller ind over den flade strand, virker ældre end alt, jeg kender.

Herude er træerne bøjet af vindens vedholdenhed. Alt føles råt og ubarmhjertigt. Men jeg får også fornemmelsen af det ægte – oplevelsen af at være en sårbar skabning midt i klodens barske natur.

Fyrtårnet står deroppe. Et historisk minde om tidligere tiders kampe mod strandinger på denne barske kyst. Men kysten er også i sig selv sårbar. Havet eroderer stranden, og skrænterne op mod menneskets bygninger og marker er et nemt bytte for frådende bølger, når efterårsstormene raser.

Jeg føler mig lille og fornemmer min sårbarhed som menneske. Jeg bliver stående længe, opslugt af oplevelse af den kolde vind, tågen og havets urokkelige kraft.

I al denne rå natur finder jeg også skønheden. Kystlandskabet i november.

Coastal Land in November

I stand by the coast facing the great sea. The fog lies heavy and dense around me. The sound of the waves rolling in over the flat beach feels older than anything I know.

Out here the trees are bent by the persistence of the wind. Everything feels raw and merciless. But I also get a sense of the genuine—the experience of being a vulnerable creature in the planet's harsh nature.

The lighthouse stands up there. A historical reminder of earlier times' struggles against shipwrecks on this rugged coast. But the coast itself is also vulnerable. The sea erodes the beach, and the cliffs rising toward human buildings and fields are easy prey for the raging waves when the autumn storms roar.

I feel small and sense my vulnerability as a human being. I remain standing for a long time, absorbed by the experience of the cold wind, the fog, and the sea's unshakable power.

In all this raw nature I also find beauty. The coastal landscape in November.
