

Isolation

The world population is estimated to include more than seven billion people. The number of people increases day by day and the big cities of man can be watch from space.

Nevertheless, we still are able to experience completely isolated places on the Earth's surface. Greenland is one of the world's most isolated communities. Large parts of the largest island on the earth's surface offer places where you can experience complete isolation from all other people in the world.

This place is a deep fiord on the west coast of Greenland. I do not know the name of the fiord. Let us not give the place a name. Today this landscape is covered with mist and a thick layer of clouds, and the ice at the sea surface is thick and impassable.

This place seems impassable, cold and barren. But I know that if I move into the landscape, the place will open up, and I will find flora and fauna that I never would have believed could survive in such a place.

The main feeling I get for this site, can be characterized with one word; isolation. I know that the fiord is far from the small settlements along the west coast of Greenland. I know that fishermen and hunters and geologists gets around and perhaps have walked the hillsides in this landscape.

But I will on my way into this isolated locality consider if this particular place before has been visited by a human being? The place seems so isolated that several small or large locations in here must have secrets, which never have been revealed to any other human beings in the whole world.

This landscape has a great atmosphere. Maybe it really hides something extraordinary? Something which the place never has given away to a human being?

The west coast of Greenland, May 2015