

The battle between the blue and the green light

Change often happens without that we register them. Change can happen as a kind of no-decisions. While we are extremely aware of some specific proposals for changes in the society and uses a lot of energy to debate and argue for or against one or another proposal for a change, then trailed far more far-reaching changes in the society, without us actually notice the.

Inuit have created a strong culture and identity throughout the Arctic. Awareness of the fight for self-determination, choice of languages and preservation of culture is strong here in Greenland.

But change is imminent. Many want to defend the unique culture and identity by turning inward and create unity with relatively sharp limits to everything out there in the world. Others have abandoned this strategy. Young people are looking more and more into the world to educate themselves, and Greenland becomes economically and culturally more and more entangled in the forces of globalization.

From my little house on the mountain symbolizes the evening's colors this eternal struggle: the struggle between the green and blue light. Up in the sky plays the green northern lights at night after night across the sky. The light has followed the Inuit culture throughout its history and has formed the basis of many myths and legends.

But down in the city there will be blue light out of the windows with the yellow light from the room light. The blue light comes from the television and computer screens. Most television is tuned to foreign channels, and the young people follow world events outside of Greenland on their computer screens.

Qaqortoq, March 2015