

Evening tea

I am sitting here in my library on a Friday night in September. Outside one of the first autumn storms is raging. The gusts of wind are as strong as hurricanes. The storm brings lots of rain on its way from Newfoundland across the Davis Strait to the west coast of Greenland.

In front of me on the table stands a cup of steaming tea - green tea with ginger and lemon and sweetened with a teaspoon of acacia honey.

I am busy getting a closer look at the photos from the summer expeditions with my camera. Now I have come to the season when the main focus of the work with photos is to process the photos and to write small essays on the story that underlies each photo.

I have a good feeling for landscape photography. In July, I again visited Sweden and the countryside around the lake, Sövdesjön. The last day I photographed from the vantage point Ramnakulla. Ramnakulla is an area of dry meadows on a moraine hill. From Ramnakulla there are a good view to the beautiful Swedish manor landscape around the lakes Snogeholmsjön and Sövdesjön.

The memoirs about the visit that summer day on Ramnakulla together with the green tea give pleasure this stormy September evening in the Arctic.

The view from Ramnakulla towards the lake Sövdesjön, July 2013