

The order of nature

From the unknown order of the roots of the fern beneath the surface a stem grows up with a leaf on top of another leaf on top of another leaf on top of another leaf.

The leaves split into smaller leaves, which again divide into smaller leaves, which again divide into smaller leaves.

Next to the stem a second stem is put forth, next to another stem. The stems form a fern. Beside the fern is another fern which stands next to another fern.

In the flora, the fern has a name.

On the next page of the flora is a different fern from the same family. The families of the ferns constitute classes, which constitute a phylum.

Man has created this order in my flora. Beside the flora on my shelf is another book, next to another book. All the books describe the order of nature.

Although Man creates disorder in the order of nature, Man himself is a part of the order of nature. If Man believes the order of nature is a meaningless order, maybe Man himself is meaningless?

Skåne, South Sweden,
July 2016

The order of nature

Quit

Go to the Text